In the wake of her mother's death, Jane stumbles through her days in a fog of grief. She tries to keep busy with her job as a conservator at a local museum, but her mind keeps wandering back to her mother. She can't shake the feeling that her mother is still with her, watching over her.

One day, Jane is working on a painting of a woman who lived in the city centuries ago. As she looks at the woman's face, she begins to see something strange. It's as if the woman is alive, and she's trying to communicate with Jane.

Jane becomes obsessed with the painting. She spends hours staring at it, trying to decipher its secrets. She starts to neglect her job and her friends. She becomes increasingly isolated, withdrawn into her own world.

But as Jane delves deeper into the painting, she begins to unravel a dark secret. The woman in the painting is not who she seems. She is a dangerous and malevolent force, and she wants Jane's soul.

Jane must now confront her grief and loss, and come to terms with the darkness that lies within her.
