

Georgia POW Camps in World War II: An Inside Look at a Hidden History

During World War II, the United States faced a unique challenge: what to do with the thousands of prisoners of war (POWs) captured from enemy nations. In response, the U.S. government established a network of POW camps throughout the country. Georgia was one of the states that housed these camps, with eight facilities located across the state.

The Georgia POW camps were home to thousands of German and Italian prisoners. These prisoners were captured in North Africa, Europe, and the Pacific. The camps were designed to provide a secure environment for the prisoners while also allowing them to contribute to the war effort.
