The Russian fleet, under the command of Admiral Zinovy Rozhdestvensky, had sailed from the Baltic Sea in October 1904. It was a long and arduous journey, and the fleet was plagued by mechanical problems and shortages of supplies. By the time it reached the Sea of Japan in May 1905, it was in a weakened state.

The Japanese fleet, under the command of Admiral Togo Heihachiro, was waiting for the Russian fleet in the Tsushima Strait. Togo had a well-trained and well-equipped fleet, and he was confident of victory.

The battle began on May 27, 1905, when the Russian fleet entered the Tsushima Strait. The Japanese fleet immediately attacked, and the two fleets exchanged fire for several hours. The Russian fleet was outgunned and outmaneuvered, and it was soon clear that it was doomed to defeat.

By the end of the day, the Russian fleet had been virtually annihilated. Only a few ships managed to escape, and they were later interned in neutral ports. The Japanese fleet had won a decisive victory, and it had established itself as the dominant naval power in the Far East.

The Battle of Tsushima was a turning point in the Russo-Japanese War. The Russian defeat led to the collapse of Russian power in the Far East, and it paved the way for Japan's victory in the war.

The battle also had a profound impact on the development of naval warfare. It showed that the battleship was no longer the dominant warship, and it led to the development of new types of warships, such as the destroyer and the submarine.

The Battle of Tsushima is still studied today by naval historians and strategists. It is a classic example of a decisive naval battle, and it is a reminder of the importance of naval power in the modern world.
